

A GRUESOME FIND.

A Chinaman's Hand in a Can—The Murder Theory Dispelled.

The Chinese have a very revolting custom of saving, for future reference, all parts of their bodies which have become detached in any manner. About a year and a half ago a Chinaman at Ewa plantation had his left hand so badly injured in an accident that it became necessary to have the member amputated. He came to Honolulu and had the operation performed.

Upon returning to Ewa he took his amputated hand to a cousin who then kept a poi shop in one of John Colburn's houses on Maunakea street. It had been placed in a new tin pail and hermetically sealed to keep out the germs of decomposition. Ah Wa, the faithful cousin, took his relation's hand, shook it and put it away in a safe corner, there to remain until called for. Then the one-handed Chinaman went back to Ewa feeling certain that he had succeeded in finding a safe resting-place for his hand until such a time as he should see fit to accompany it back to the land of his birth.

A short time ago Ah Wa moved his place of taro pounding and forgot to take with him the hand of his relation. He had put the tin pail containing it into an iron pot used for cooking and had left this in a dark corner, evidently expecting to carry it away.

Yesterday morning an old native, employed by John Colburn, was set to work cleaning the recent poi shop in preparation for the arrival of a new tenant. He came upon the pail, and thinking it might contain something of value, pulled off the top. What he found was a shrivelled hand, from which emanated a very sickening odor. It had been cut off two or three inches above the wrist, and was bent around to fit the pail.

This was more than the native could stand, and, in a very excited state, he ran to the police station, where he told his story.

Captain Scott was dispatched to the scene to investigate the matter. Ah Wa, the last occupant of the building, was arrested and held for investigation. His cousin will be up from Ewa today to identify property, at which time Ah Wa will, probably, have all suspicion removed from him and walk about again with head erect.

Nuanua Stream.

Natives are at work digging a ditch and constructing a retaining wall on the mauka side of King street, on the Ewa side of the wash-houses. The discharge pipe from the bay extends under the car-line to a point just alongside the wash-house, and it is through this that the mud will be carried from the bay to the low lands opposite.

The odor from the mud is becoming offensive to passers by even at this early stage of the work. At the present rate, it will be completed in about eight months.

It is understood that some of the physicians in the Board of Health object to this plan as being unsanitary, preference being given to a suggestion to fill the land in with dry earth brought in from Moanala.

A Distinction With a Difference.

Evidently Chinamen appreciate the truth as well as individuals of other nationalities. Last night three Mongolians were seen standing outside the police station; they said they were waiting for some of their comrades who were putting up bail in the police station office for violating the laws by conducting a game of che. One of the men was asked if he had not been in some manner connected with the game. Promptly came the reply, "Me no got money. No money, no pilikia. Chinamen inside he got money. You see? him pilikia."

The candidate most mentioned to succeed Lieutenant Kenake is Second Lieutenant Jacobsen. First Sergeant Giles is a candidate for Jacobsen's place against Dr. J. T. Wayson. Friends of the different candidates are doing considerable work among the members in order to elect their favorites.
